REALTORS® Expect Continued Home Price Growth in Most States in the Next 12 Months

Posted in Economist Commentaries, by Scholastica (Gay) Cororaton, Research Economist September 27, 2017

In the monthly REALTORS® Confidence Index Survey, the National Association of REALTORS® asks members "In the neighborhood or area where you make most of your sales, what are your expectations for residential property prices over the next year?"

Home prices have been on the rise as demand continues to outstrip supply. At the end of August 2017, the inventory of homes for sale stood at 1.88 million homes, which is equivalent to 4.2 months of the current monthly sales pace. Month's supply has been falling since January 2015, 27 consecutive months now. With falling inventory, home prices have increased. As of August 2017, the median price of existing homes sold was $253,500, surpassing the peak median price of $229,500 in June 2006.

The map below shows the median expected price change of the respondents in the next 12 months at the state level, according to respondents in the August 2017 REALTORS® Confidence Index Survey. [1] REALTOR® respondents expected strong price growth in Washington, Nevada, Utah, and Colorado, of more than five percent in the next 12 months.

Housing starts, although improving, have not kept pace with the 1.5 million estimated demand for units coming from net household formation (about 1.2 million) and units needed to replace obsolete or destroyed homes.

Housing starts need to ramp up even further, especially in Texas and Florida, to replace the housing units damaged or destroyed by hurricanes Harvey and Irma. In Texas alone, the Texas Division of Emergency Management of the Department of Public Safety reported that as of September 19, there were 15,458 destroyed residential properties and 61,667 damaged properties (single-family, mobile, and multi-family).[2]

Welcome to the Anna Maria Sales Team, Jason Hrnak!

Jason grew up in Oshkosh, Wisconsin and visited Anna Maria Island with his parents and grandparents as a child. Once Jason felt the sand between his toes for the first time, he knew he wanted to live at the beach. That dream became a reality in 1999 when Jason moved to Holmes Beach. It didn't take long for Jason to slip into island life and really enjoy sun soaked days on the beach. Jason studied internet business foundations, web design, graphic design, and multimedia technology. He began his career in real estate by marketing both
